RESTful Dictionary

English — HTTP

Cesare Pautasso

Preface

This reference work is meant to help you to translate English verbs into HTTP methods.

The English language has a very large number of verbs, some of which are also often found in so-called RESTful APIs. These are APIs which attempt to make use of the HTTP protocol, which was originally designed to build the Web and – as a consequence – includes a small set of methods: the famous GET, PUT, DELETE, POST, but also PATCH (and a few others, which are in practice very rarely used).

How can the HTTP method be chosen based on the action that an API should perform on behalf of the client? Should the choice depend on the resource on which the action is performed?

This is one of the grand challenges of RESTful API design: designers often struggle to map a large set of actions (represented using English verbs) from arbitrary application domains into a very small, but standard-compliant, set of HTTP methods, which was codified more than 3 decades ago to address the requirements of the World Wide Web, a decentralized hypermedia application for publishing, browsing and reading scientific publications.

In case you are unsure which HTTP method to pick – look no further, just look it up in this dictionary.

How to Use

This dictionary distills the collective knowledge of designers of many thousands of APIs to answer one question: Which HTTP method should be used for my action?

Actions (Verbs)

Here is an example of an API structure featuring actions:

In the example, a container with a certain identifier can be subjected to many different actions: start, stop, pause, unpause, copy, execute, resize, or even kill, wait, and restart. Since these are distinct actions applicable to the same container, they cannot be simply mapped in the same POST method invocation.

To distinguish them, the designers of this API have appended the action verb at the end of the path.

In YAML, an extract of the the OpenAPI structure would look like:

```
...
paths:
  /containers/{id}/attach:
    post:
  /containers/{id}/changes:
    get:
  /containers/{id}/copy:
    post:
  /containers/{id}/exec:
    post:
  /containers/{id}/export:
    get:
...
```

Is POST the only applicable method? We see from the example that in addition to object names like “changes”, also some actions like “export” are associated with the GET method.

More in general, this is the design decision the first part of the dictionary is focused on:

```
paths:
  /PATH/ACTION:
    METHOD:
```

which HTTP METHOD goes well with the corresponding ACTION, when:

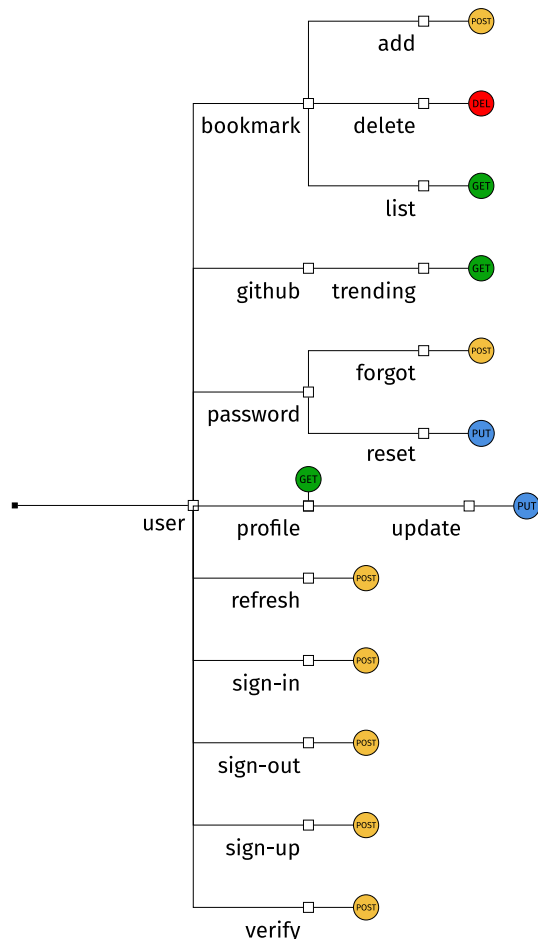

1. this action is explicitly represent using an English language verb
2. such verb is found at the end of some resource PATH
3. only one METHOD should be picked.

The English verbs — HTTP method mappings included in the first part of the dictionary are not meant to be used in any other context.

Actions on Resources (Verbs and Nouns)

In addition to the action, the HTTP method can be influenced by the type of resources on which it is applied.

Let’s look at another example with a deeper API structure:

Also in this case, there is a single HTTP method for each path ending with an action. For example, to list, add or delete. However, the actions are applied to a specific type of resource, like a bookmark, a password, or a user and their profile.

The second part of the dictionary considers both the action and the resource combination for recommending a corresponding HTTP method.

This helps with picking a method for paths that have a deeper structure, where the action refers to a specific type of resource:

paths:

/PATH/RESOURCE/ACTION:
METHOD:

Again, similar assumptions hold:

1. the ACTION is explicitly represent using an English language verb
2. such verb is found at the end of some PATH
3. immediately before the verb, we find a noun indicating the RESOURCE on which the ACTION is applied.
4. only one METHOD should be picked.

This is the only context in which the English verbs/nouns — HTTP method mappings included in the second part of the dictionary are meant to be used.

During the post-keynote discussions with the organizers and participants of the Microservices 2022 conference, I realized that many API developers still struggle with correctly making this API design decision and often are afraid of picking the "wrong" HTTP method. During the return trip, the idea of a RESTful dictionary was born.

The verbs and nouns extracted from the API paths have been detected using the English language wordnet by Princeton University.

There are many wonderful books on Web API design. They document the properties of the HTTP protocol and explain how to correctly use it to publish RESTful APIs. They have influenced generations of API developers to create the 62039 API descriptions which we have analyzed to obtain this RESTful dictionary.

Thanks to you all.
